

MEANWHILE ON THE BOX LAST NIGHTThose Robinson nightmares

Big Daddy Robinson had his hands full last night coping with "the most bitter war a family ever faced," writes Val Paquet.

In spite of his pretty speeches and that stoic attitude which can sometimes be nauseating, there was a time when it looked as if he and his loved ones were about to be devoured by a mammoth army of ants.

All very well for adult viewers, but what about the little ones who have just sat through a harmless "Playhouse"? Some of the nightmare-inducing adventures, involving maniac pirates and sudden close-

take some digesting

ups on skeletons, take some digesting, and I wonder how suitable they are for the under-fives.

As a fan of the series, I think the problem of sleepless nights for the tots could be solved by changing slots with Laurel and Hardy.

If we didn't see what the programme schedule promised on "Pulse," it didn't matter. The interview with Bulie Indamse and Hazel Clarke of Moral Rearmament, was one of the most refreshing I have seen on The Box for a long while.

Charming guests committed to their belief, the two young people explained simply and with sincerity just how they had come to join the movement.

There must have been a few raised eyebrows in South African lounges as Hazel talked of the influence of a black colleague who had "forgiven" the whites of this country for their attitude to her race and had thus become involved in understanding the problems.
