

Music breaks down all barriers, they find

The Colwell Brothers are three very talented and very dedicated young men.

Six years ago they were immersed in the get-rich-quick world of Hollywood entertainment. A big career on radio and television lay open to them.

Then, one day they found themselves faced with an ideology which changed their lives, sent them on a world-wide tour and brought them to South Africa this year.

The principle to which Steve (26), Paul (23) and Ralph (21) have dedicated themselves is that of Moral Re-armament.

THREW UP CAREERS

It was in order to take the idea to the rest of the world that the three young men threw up their Hollywood careers and offered the use of their talents.

Their visit to Johannesburg is the last stop of a tour of the Union, during which they have sung and played to thousand of people who have been to see the Moral Re-armament film "Freedom."

In the past six years the Colwell brothers, who were born in Michigan, have visited five continents as musical ambassadors of Moral Re-armament.

They appear personally at each showing of "Freedom," a film written by a South African teacher, Manasseh Moerane.

"Music breaks down all barriers," said Paul.
